The University of Graz (Austria) is offering an interdisciplinary masters programme in European integration and regionalism starting at the beginning of the academic year 2003/04. The University has entrusted two institutions with the implementation of this programme: the European Academy of Bozen/Bolzano (Italy), and the European Institute for Public Administration (Antenna Luxembourg). In addition, a network of partner universities throughout Europe will provide a strong backup for the programme.

The proposed curriculum is highly interdisciplinary and designed to provide in particular a thorough understanding

- of the institutions and fundamental concepts of EU and European Community law,
- regional and social policies,
- regionalism and federalism,
- cultural diversity and minority protection in the context of the process of European integration.

A strong focus on the horizontal integration of regions, citizens, minorities, and cultures in Europe plus its ›bottom-up‹ approach differentiate this innovative masters programme from other European studies courses.

The programme will be of particular interest to:

- post-graduate students in law, economics, social and political sciences and history,
- civil servants from national or regional administrations,
- journalists and teachers.

Applications may be made to the full study programme but also to any of the five modules individually.
